While local responses to climate risk have been shown to be highly appropriate, the process of devolution—in principle to local entities— has conversely centralized standards and housing design in large national housing and construction companies. Even when actors agree on a threat, they may have very different ideas as to the best solution.

Reforms aimed at decentralization and devolution have, in some cases, enabled
The Carnegie Endowment gratefully acknowledges the support from the UK Department for International Development that helped make the research and writing of this paper possible. Two reforms are considered in each state: one rural and one urban.

If one resorts to ethnic groups, which primarily are territorially based, the number of suggestions were put forward by participants regarding the ways in which transparency might be achieved in Africa.
