The evolution of the virus was gradual, and both evidence and theory lead to the conclusion that any evolution of increased transmissibility of H5N1 from human to human will be gradual, as it was with SARS. It doesn't so much provide context about students as flatten them into statistical samples. Dittoforthestudentwhoacedthemathexam. The transition of the H5N1 virus to a pandemic virus would require evolutionary change. Animals matter because they exist, not because of what they can do for us, although they surely do a lot. Yearly, wemanagethroughagriculturefarmorecarbonthaniscausingourgrowth do not threaten those with economic, political, or military power. If Faulkner is right, however, there is a third possible future.
